

Cheaper will cost you more!

You have decided to buy a shed because you are running out of space in your garage, home, etc. Like so many people, you will shop around and try to find the best price. There is nothing wrong with doing that provided you don't end up with a low quality, poorly-built shed. Ask yourself the following questions:

- Has the shed company been doing business in this area long?
- What is the Better Business Bureau ranking of shed company?
- Have you been offered a free site visit to determine the size and best location for a shed?
- Is the sales person knowledgeable about sheds and able to help you get the answers you need?
- Does the company have a physical location as well as a website?
- Is set up and delivery of shed free of charge?
- Will the shed you select be built with top grade materials? (i.e.: kiln-dried lumber)
- Has the sales person talked with you about permit requirements?
- Are there structural features included on this shed that are missing (or not listed) with other sheds you are considering?
- Will every effort be made to satisfy home owners' association requirements?
- Can the shed be built with an appearance that will go well with existing structures on your property?
- Should you decide to move your shed to another location, can the move be performed by the shed builder?
- Are you committed to paying a fair price for a shed that will be well-constructed with durability, service, and attractiveness and meet all industry standards?

(Hint: It is important to know these answers.)
